In 1984, Michael bought an espresso coffee machine from a friend who had the very rare and collectible 33 logo. This machine has since been passed on to his daughter, and on to his son. This machine got passed around the family (which didn't have a lot of money) for quite a few years, and ended up with his daughter, who had a baby. After several years, the daughter's son grew up enough to fall in love with the espresso machine. He asked his father if he could buy it back from him. Due to family circumstances (illness) Michael could not give the machine away and did not want to part with it for a song. So the son did not buy the machine back from his dad. He came back a year or so later and asked his dad if he wanted to sell the machine to him for $150. The father quickly and truthfully said "no" because the machine was a very expensive investment. It represented 8 years of his life, plus more for his college education. Both (the father and son) were happy with their decision, but the son's brother wanted to get the machine, so he paid $150 for it. The next morning, the brother came to his father and said he bought the machine for the father, and the father wanted to buy it back. But the son told him no that morning and they were both happy. This story has continued over the years with each generation having someone to buy and sell the machine to. It is Michael's machine and he has to this day always tell the story about how he was never able to sell it because it was a "very, very, very unique piece of hardware". It represents the great bond he shares with his son. He says there are stories from his childhood that taught him similar lessons about relationships and life. The title (and the first word in the story) is based on an fprc tag file that I wrote in JavaScript. This JavaScript runs as a javascript file from the XML content when the page loads. And it works. It makes all the tags inside the fprc tag file available to me. Is this a good way to create and maintain a tag file? Here is another story of being "cooped up in the house" Other books I have included in my pdf (available on the FTP site) Phot
